Early American Village Recreated in Home Colony

Frank E. Wade and Albert Wichard, builders, opened yesterday in preview of Old Chester Hills, a new 75-home community in the Greenlawn section of Huntington, L. I., which will offer three models styled along the lines of Colonial architecture. The homes, which are priced from $18,990 to $22,990, occupy approximately one acre of rolling, wooded terrain each, and are equipped with wood-burning fireplaces, interesting new kitchens by General Electric and paved terraces. Albert B. Meklenburg Organization, Inc., Roslyn L. I., is the selling agent.

In the new community, Wade & Wichard aim at recreating the picturesque plan of an early American village with winding country lanes, irregular orientation of home sites, close adaptation of houses to the hilly terrain, and even such fine ponts of period design as the use of hand-hewn shingles for the exteriors. The site formerly belonged to a wealthy family who retain—and still live on—the larger, adjoining part of the estate. As stipulated by them, the rich stands of cedar, oak, pine and dogwood trees on the property will remain undisturbed.

The most notable model being introduced by Wade & Wichard, is the 68-foot-long "Early American Farmhouse." It has an unusual staggered roofline, not unlike an old homestead to which successive generations of a family have added ells and wings.

All homes share Wade & Wichard's building specifications which include electric exhause fans in kitchens, specially made kitchen hardware, colored ceramic tile bathrooms with matching vitreous fixtures and double mirror sliding door cabinets, oil-fired hot water heat with convectors, flush mahogany doors, oak floors over subflooring, copper plumbing, full insulation in walls and ceilings, gutters and leaders, and public-service water and electricity.
